Customer Reviews

The best novel series out there have several defining factors - a number of common points. First, they have to have memorable characters that grow and change as the series progresses, but retain enough of the characteristics that the readers has come to expect and love. Secondly, and this follows closely with the characters, there has to be a wide variety of interesting supporting characters as well - not only heroes, but the villains. Both we look forward to seeing in the future. Third, and this is really important, the mythology, the canon behind the series itself. How the author sets up the world he's created, and his eye for detail. This goes hand in hand with continuity. You lose the continuity, you lose the detail and the canon becomes, at best, haphazard and a real mess. These are the three things that I love about two different series. The Dresden Files, and Outlanders. Of course, this review is about Small Favour - Book ten of the Dresden files by Jim Butcher. Poor Harry Dresden. He's been through a lot over the years. He's been tempted by a fallen Angel, had his girlfriend taken from him by the Red Court, been in trouble more times than he can count with the White Council... just to name a few of the things that have happened to him. But what doesn't kill you makes you stronger. A man that he despises has disappeared, and the Winter Court forces Harry to search for him, by calling in a marker, one of the two remaining favours owed to Mab, the queen of the Winter Fae. Of course, as much as Harry would like to tell her to shove it, he has no choice but to do as she asks. And that only invites more misery into his life.
